

PS 3537

.C58 H4

1910

Hesper-

Phosphor

JOHN WILLIAM SCHOLL

HESPER-PHOSPHOR

AND

OTHER POEMS

BY

JOHN WILLIAM SCHOLL

AUTHOR OF

"THE LIGHT-BEARER OF LIBERTY, ETC."

"SOCIAL TRAGEDIES, ETC." "AN ODE TO THE RUSSIAN PEOPLE."

'Nonumque prematur in annum'—Horace 1910

GEORGE WAHR, BOOKSELLER
ANN ARBOR, MICHIGAN

PS 3537
C58 H4
1910

Copyrighted 1910
by
J. W. SCHOLL

THE ANN ARBOR PRESS

©Cl. A268554

This Edition is limited to two hundred and fifty copies, each numbered and autographed by the author. Two hundred copies are offered for sale, of which this copy is Number .....

CONTENTS

HESPER-PHOSPHOR . . .	Page 1
A GRAY DAY . . . .	" 35
BEN HADAD . . . .	" 39
BALLAD OF THE GOOD SHIP, "DAUNTLESS" . . .	" 43
MID CLOVER BLOOMS . .	" 46
THE VANISHED WOODS . .	" 48
A SONG OF RENEWAL . .	" 51
IMPERFECTION . . . .	" 55
SONNET . . . . .	" 56

HESPER-PHOSPHOR.

Creak the icy maples drooping o'er the hedge's crystal wall,
And the sheeted pinetrees shudder till their ghostly burdens fall.

Shrouded thick in moonlit whiteness lies the pavement and the street, And the lawn, shrub-tufted, glitters with the fret-work of the sleet.

Stiffened in his mail of hoar-frost, gone for aye his fruited prime, Lies the old Year, dying, dying, waiting for the midnight chime.

Let us keep the wonted vigil! While the dying hours go by,
While his frosted breath is on us, let us watch the old Year die!

Many a midnight by the firelight have we watched the old Year out, Greeted then the new-born Year, and hailed each other with a shout,

And the night grew wild with whistles, and the merry anvil's sound Woke the village, woke the sleeping countryside for miles around.

But tonight be hushed alarum! Peace brood o'er us far and near,
For a wondrous Age is passing with the passing of the Year!

And the youngest of us here will pass away gray-bearded men, Be forgotten as these verses, when a century dawns again!

Vale! Vale! Strokes of midnight! Rustle of the sable pall!
Vale! Vale! Parting splendor! Hush and pomp funereal!

Grandest Age of all the ages since the march of mind began
From the dull unconscious atom to the crowning type of man!

First a million million ages ere the rolling year was born,
Then a hundred million slumbered ere as yet
'twas early morn!

"Out of Chaos into Cosmos!" was the infinite decree,
And at dawn the dry land lifted from the universal sea,

And the vapors hung and brooded o'er the hot and humid earth Till the tepid Ocean labored in her myriad myriad birth!

Life from Death? Aye, Life from Death,—a wonder grown familiar now,— Though remains unanswered still the old sphinx-riddle of the "How?"

Ask no final Whence? nor Whither? 'Tis enough to watch the sweep Of the rising tide of life that issued from that ancient deep.

Build your systems, Metaphysics! Dream your dreams, Enthusiasm!
You will never find the Alpha, never bridge the yawning chasm!

Whether countless universes ran their courses one by one Ere the present Wondrous Order its ascending race begun

Leave to childish minds that love to chase the rain-bow's hidden gold, Or to starveling logic-hunters that have left the shepherd's fold

Just to stray in barren pastures, tired of Truth's green meadow-land,— Just to thirst mid sage and cactus, blinded with the drifting sand.

Ask no final Whence? nor Whither? 'Tis enough for you and me If we mark the sea-weed drifting in that warm primæval sea,

For potential in that floating swarm of mute Eoic life Lies the soul of man awaiting its development through strife.

How the green life climbs the sea-shore, mounts the everlasting hills!
How the blind touch grows to eyesight! How sensations grow to wills!

And a thousand forms of creeping, running, leaping, flying things Battle for the Earth's dominions like hereditary kings.

Battles royal red with carnage, myriads perished for the few,
But the little band that conquered peopled all the earth anew.

Coward blood and weakness perished, strength and royal blood prevailed, Till the lion's thews were born, and Jove's clouddwelling eagle sailed.

Rose erect at length among them one more noble than the rest, Life superior slowly growing to supreme in head and breast.

Heir of all that mind had conquered, son of half a million years,
In his brain involved the greatness of a myriad dead careers,

Reptile, bird, and beast had struggled, suffered and enjoyed that he,
Crown of Life and Sum of Being, might fulfill the old decree:

"Out of Chaos into Cosmos! Out of darkness into light!
Out of matter into spirit! Out of blindness into sight!"

Like a quiver stuffed with arrows from the armory of the past Brain and heart were armed with every shaft that mind had ever cast.

Like the bearded grain that hoards within its narrow flinty cell Three months' sunshine, Soul imprisoned all the mystic light that fell

From her blue skies overhead and from her silent stars of night,— Danaë to the virile ages in their long incessant flight,

Till a race was born that sometimes in its best embodiment Conquers Nature and compels her to subserve its own intent,

Makes a Caliban of lightning, rides the chariot of the seas, Ties the continents together, makes its dreams realities!

But impartial Nature levies on each race her fatal tax.
Overplus in aught is purchased by a somewhat else that lacks.

At each turning-point of races, as of men, they stand and choose, Conscious or unconscious, boots not, what to gain and what to lose.

And we chose to stand erect with ample front expanded high,
Masters of the fecund earth and lords of all the sea and sky.

Gone therefore the thews that grappled, gone the armor of defense, Gone the hardihood that recked not, gone the keenness of the sense.

Old Prometheus, manhood-maker, loosed the tongue, nor failed to teach Incoherent cries to mingle into man-uniting speech,

Called the wild unsocial tribesman from the cliff and from the den, Made the village, chose the chieftain, gave new laws to social men,

Gave them flint and bronze and iron, kindled fire upon the hearth, Set the vestal in the home to guard the new and marvelous birth,

Put the skins of beasts upon them, gave them flocks and lowing kine, Curved the plowshare, yoked the oxen, taught the elm to wed the vine,

Marked the seasons, set the feast-days, gave the virgins dance and song, Wreathed the bowl of rich Lyæan whence the cup went round the throng.

Centuries of centuries titanic dæmons of Forethought With their ever-crescent forces daily, hourly moved and wrought,

Till the vasty lump was leavened, man became self-conscious mind, And papyri kept the record of the deeds of humankind.

But a sable thread was mingled in the growing web of life.

At the earliest dawn of being Fear was born amid the strife;

Then Life's field of darkness widened, broidered with a sable thread, And the Parcae's subtle weaving grew a chronicle of dread.

Starving from the fruitless chase the rude barbarian in his tent Dreams of starting noble game and follows till the night is spent,

Sees his comrades, shouts among them, lets the fatal arrow fly, Bickers o'er the fallen booty,—greet the new day's golden eye,—

And the dreaming and the waking are one vision unto him, Real as the strength that unspent throbs within each lusty limb.

While his body lies supine a subtle something wanders free, Seeks again the distant godland, climbs the mountain, skims the sea,

Or, in hostile ambush fallen, screams and flies the demon shapes, Makes for the deserted body, wakes in anguish and escapes.

So the dreamer's airy phantoms, shades of friends and enemies, Live for his untutored fancy Being's primal verities.

When the long long sleep that wakes not with its white calm supervenes, And the chieftain's ghostly double wanders on in distant scenes,

Shout the assembled guests and kinsmen, shout the slaves of his domain, Wake ten thousand mournful echoes to recall him home again,

Sit and watch the placid sleeper, drive the vultures from their prey, Till the ghastly rigor warns them of the shade's too long delay.

Drunk perchance with undreamed splendor in the great ancestral Hall He forgets their ancient homage, hears not their despairing call.

Honored in that Hall of Fathers, chief among the warrior hosts,
He returns not to their yearning from the sunset land of ghosts.

Then the funeral pyre is built and high the honored corse is laid, Fire is kindled, to the flames a thousand votive gifts are paid,

And the best-loved wife in transport leaps into the sacred fire, And the slaves make loud contention which shall mount the master's pyre,

And his horse is slain beside him harnessed for the regal chase,
And the stag-horn lance is brought him and the ponderous armored mace,

Long the funeral feast is kept, as suits the warrior's high degree.
Thousands heap the lofty barrow for immortal memory.

But the earth is not the same earth, and the sky is less serene,
For the empire of the Unseen claims allegiance of the Seen.

Swift as thought, unseen as wind, unfelt but present everywhere, Lowers the ghostly Tyranny and broods the never-sleeping Care.

Time revolves his swiftest cycles. Death, the harvester of Time, Thrusts his sickle in the nations, and men fall before their prime.

Hind and hero fall together, chaff amid the golden corn, But the fallen hero only overlives the morrow morn.

Thus with each translated warrior grows the unseen realm of shades:
Will on will, a countless synod, earth and sea and sky invades,

Till the very air is darkened, earth infected with a pest,
And the ocean-stream roars round her with a demon-stirred unrest.

How the crushed souls writhe in anguish, how the mangled forms rebel 'Twixt those millstones of despair, an upper and a nether hell!

For the all-beholding heaven from his brazen canopy Shakes the pitiless plagues upon them as the sun-god's arrows fly,

Hurls the thunderbolts and hailstones, pours the devastating flood, Sends the legions of the hoar-frost, blights the fruit within the bud,

While the old confederate earth-god, hoarding up the sun-god's beams, Feeds the Hydra of the fen and 'stills a poison in his streams.

Fear, Life's first-born, child of panic, tyrant of the seeing eye, Slave of every unseen terror hung between the earth and sky,

Gathers up her unhewn stones and heaps an altar to her foes, Where the blood of countless victims in propitiation flows;

Temples rise on every hilltop, Python sleeps in every cave, Voices fraught with fearful boding speak where oaks centennial wave,

Myriad rills of civic manhood, gathered into widening streams, Rolled majestic down the ages bending to the despots' dreams.

Bounded swift and ever swifter forward then the race of man.

One by one the eastern empires swift but glorious courses ran,

Till at length a conquering manhood, having left its Aryan home,

Made the splendor that was Greece and made the glory that was Rome.

Long the golden eagles brooded o'er the imperial seven hills.

Long the Eternal City flourished, built a purple name that fills

Ten long centuries with splendor. Rome, the mistress of the seas, Stretched her right hand to the westward,— Gaul unlocked her treasures,—

Stretched her left hand to the eastward,—Asia filled it with the spoils Of the old Levantine empires, cloth of gold and perfumed oils,—

At her right foot lay the honors brought from Dido's ruined pile, At her left foot knelt the Egyptian with the offerings of the Nile,

While behind her rose the war-cries and the clash of German swords Driven o'er the Rhine and Danube with their wild barbarian hordes.

Civic virtue, martial valor, justice and the reign of law, Hearts of oak and thews of iron, and the nations stood in awe!

When the Caesar's mighty hands the Janus-temple gates had closed, And beneath the mild Augustus all the happy world reposed,

What Cassandra mid the purple could the impending fates foretell, While the poet's proudest vaunting unto all men sounded well;

That the empire should be bounded only by the ocean-stream
And endure to endless ages splendid as the Caesars' dream?

But, alas! the mighty rhythm of the age's upward surge Dooms all glory to extinction, even at its topmost verge.

Roman valor drained in battle, virtue checked in her career, Turned to wealth and luxury nor dreamed that any doom was near,

Till the mocking legionaries set the Caesars' throne to sale, Swearing to the highest bidder with their thunderous "All hail!"

Soon the roving hordes that fretted on the Danube's burdened shore Saw the wealth and saw the weakness, saw and lusted more and more

For the spoils of conquered kingdoms, for the booty of farm and town, Looked and lusted, leaped the barriers, on the eagles' nest swooped down.

Wave on wave of primal darkness, pouring from the frozen North, Swept the Caesar from the throne and swept the glory from the earth,

And the only light that glimmered in the universal night
Was the aftershine of Athens lingering round Byzantium's height.

Centuries long that darkness brooded and the moon was blood on high And the stars forgot their office in the blackness of the sky.

Came again the twin-born scourges, priestly mitre, royal sword, And the half-quenched powers of evil were re-quickenened and restored.

Wild iconoclasts had smitten every marble into dust

And consigned the precious parchments to the realms of moth and rust,

Wan fanatics scourged their flesh and made with God's wide-flashing levin

Life the worthless antechamber of an endless golden heaven,

While the fierce, ambitious zealots armed with scaffold and with flame

Raged to stifle human progress, strove the daring soul to tame.

Flamed the fagots, flashed the axes, one by one the noblest fell

Mid the solemn priestly mockery and the wild mob's fiendish yell.

Then the herds of human cattle bent their necks beneath the yoke,

Harnessed to a brutish service, patient to the driver's stroke.

Yet the sleepless Soul of Nature, never thwarted of her end,

Sowed the blood and calmly waited for the harvest, blood must send.

But the thick-sown seeds of nations slumbered in the Empire's mould

Though Life's Maytime could not wake them from the Winter's lingering cold.

Goth and Vandal, Celt and Saxon, and the tardier Muscovite, Were the dim prophetic promise of some far dawn's whitening light.

For in God's æonic rhythms every fall beneath the plane But foredooms a rise above it,—every loss is crowned with gain.

Thanks to thee, O blinded Turk, the heathen's dread, the christian's scorn!
Thanks and hail, O glorious city, guardian of the Golden Horn!

Gallant Winkelried of nations, dying that a world might live, Thou hast given in ample measure all that mortal strength can give.

When the Moslem hordes came sweeping thou didst bare thy warrior breast, Sheathe the death within thy heart and win the victory for the West,

And thy purple life-blood scattered through the nations of the earth Warmed the dreary winter midnight, quenched at last the age-long dearth,

Turned the face of manhood forward, lifted up the spirit's eye, Wrought the new birth of a world, and set Hope's radiant star on high.

Greece reborn and Rome awakened! Though the cowed monastics raved, From their crypts the precious hundredth of the morning light was saved.

Had the Scarlet Sibyl sitting muffled in her Cave of Night Offered to the heedless Ages all her hundred leaves of light,

And at each refusal scattered half the treasure to the winds, Till, despairing, she had flung the remnant to her shaven hinds?

Or with long unsated hatred had she hunted down the light Till it found a long asylum in her dungeon's kindly night?

Little recked the patient scholar how the precious leaves were lost, While he drank the golden Wisdom that his soul could not exhaust.

How the eyes grew dim with searching, how the hands with toil grew weak!
How the fires that burned within him turned to ash upon his cheek!

But the World-soul flamed within him, and a thousand kindred lives Glowed like purple clouds of dawning when their radiant god arrives.

Woke the giant Demos starting, night's dark mantle half withdrawn, Moved his mighty limbs and struggling turned his huge face to the dawn,

And the nations felt a shudder running under altar and throne
As of earthquake under cities dreading to be overthrown.

Fair Italia, bride of Athens, mother of the modern world, Thine the daring Ocean-tamer who with faith-led sails unfurled

Westward braved the saragosso on the salt sea's stagnant verge, Braved the faithless compass needle, and Atlan-tic's stormiest surge,

Followed still with hope and wonder, cheered by seabirds' landward flight, Gazing from his lofty flagship till a New World hove in sight.

Thine the bards and thine the scholars who with dauntless energy
Toiling mid the wrecks of Time restored the lost Antiquity.

So the dreams of men were widened by thy gifts, O lavish land, And the souls of countless thousands felt their little world expand.

Life drew meaning from the vastness of its long inheritance, Earth gave promise in the vistas of her measure-less expanse.

When the German built his presses and swift cunning multiplied Thousandfold the scribes' hands the Demon of the Darkness died.

Quickening leaves with morning light sped over all the waiting earth, And the yearning soul of genius leaped and came to marvelous birth.

Woke the giant Demos struggling like a lion from his lair, Dashed the sleep from out his eyes, and shook the dews from out his hair,

And the trembling nations grappled to maintain their empery;
Yet the triple crown was shivered in the giant's victory.

Stalked the Titan through the nations, snatching here a kingly crown, Planting there a human right, there putting proud Assumption down,

Till at length he built a nation hewn from virgin wilderness Where the dragon of Oppression nevermore should find access.

Grandest Age of all the ages since the march of mind began
From the dull unconscious atom to the crowning
type of man,

Heir of all the countless ages, son of half a million years,
In thy purple youth embodied strength of myriad strong careers,

Noble bards sang round thy cradle, and a glorious burst of song Filled and thrilled thy youth with music that reëchoes loud and long;

Not the songs of helmed heroes flashing through the imbattled host, Nor of tempest-driven sailors touching every charmed coast,

Not the maddening dithyrambics filled with ruddy Bacchus' praise, Nor the lays of unveiled Venus set to feast the public gaze,

But the songs of human yearning and of purpose chaste and high, Songs of love's imperious passion quenched by pitiless destiny,

Songs of vernal greenth and beauty and of pure autumnal gold, Songs of summer woods and bird-notes, songs of harvest hundredfold,

Songs of hoary Ocean panting 'neath his burdened argosies, And of happy havens taken after stormy voyages,

Odes to Freedom, odes to Victory, and the freeman's battle hymn, Shouts of patriot exultation while the mortal eye grows dim,—

Songs of inner mystic beauty, songs of perfect form and grace, Flowers of heart and soul that make the crowning glory of our race.

“Alma Pax!” the new Age groaned with all the patient power of prayer, But the immortal gods were deafened by the brazen trumpet's blare.

War's loud front and horrid hair were shaking terrors through the world, And his blood-red banner waved to every stormy blast unfurled.

Now his hounds are kept in leash a-snarling in their secret dread, Keeping peace by daily wasting Europe's tithes of wine and bread,

For the hand of Toil grown thrifty, fostered by an armed peace, Clutches at the Demon's throat and bids the red destruction cease,

Though in Afric's vast dominions and degenerate Cathay Thrift lets loose the dogs of war to open Trade's untrammelled way.

Yet the Soul of Manhood dreaming sits upon his central throne Forging with unfailing prescience times unborn and realms unknown.

Centuries long the Dream broods on though tides of wrong surge wild below, Broods above the sightless tumult while the ages come and go,

And the floods grow calm and calmer as the cycles whirl away, Till the Dream is regnant Truth and nations come beneath its sway;

Then a new Dream of the Ages mounts to Man-hood's awful throne, Broods and conquers through the cycles till the whole world is its own.

So the hard unbending Real which with cruel strength compels Man the helpless worm to creep and eat the dust wherein he dwells,

Yields to the Eternal Manhood brooding through his silent years,
And the Man, his dreams made flesh, mounts up through widening careers,

Grasps the wheel with conscious hand, the pilot of Earth's stormy bark, And with eyes on God's stars gazing guides the nations through the dark.

Mounting so with firm foot planted on the wrecks of conquered wrong, Man, embodied Cosmic Hope, stands forth at length a titan strong,

Wrestles with the dragon-brood that still his upward way infest, Cheered amid the mortal conflict, girded for the endless quest.

Happy Age that saw the shackles burst from fifty million hands, Saw the hunted beast of burden, trembling in the marish lands,

Into man transformed, transfigured, cleansed by streams of precious blood Poured in red unstinted measure,—millionfold baptismal flood,—

Whose red chrism has healed the nations! O ye Freemen! O ye Just!
Shall we stand as idle dreamers o'er our fallen patriots' dust

And permit the sons of freemen in our land to be enslaved, Unprotesting when the injustice falls on him our fathers saved?

But the Age rolls on above them, and the evil-doer dies,
For the tide of Life is setting toward the side where justice lies.

Happy Age that saw the monarch sinking to the servant's place,
And the free man rising regnant o'er the tyrants of his race!

Happy Age that saw the priesthood sinking into slow decay,
And the free soul mounting regnant into heaven's glorious day!

Happy Age that saw the letter perish from the sacred page,
And the spirit shining regnant in the soul life of the sage!

Happy Age that saw a chaos leap into a universe At the magic touch of science, Truth dispel the ancient curse,

Drive the demons from the air, and drive the gods from out the sky, Purge the earth of half her evil bidding all her follies fly!

Happy Age that saw the Yonder fading from the dreams of men, And the Now of Love's occasion dearer than a ghostly Then!

Happy Age that conquered distance, brought the heavens down to man, Narrowed all the hostile oceans to a river's friendly span.

Saw the far horizon lift and distant nations heave in sight, Saw the isolated burgher grown at length cosmopolite!

Happy Age that conquered time, the hoar ally of distance gray, Changed the centuries to years, and crowded seasons in a day,

Flasht the lightnings, sped the couriers, keeping thought's impetuous pace, Sent the electric thrill of manhood widening down the human race!

Lo, a hand unveils the ages, flashing on my startled sight,
And a voice of power prophetic cries from out the darkness, "Write!"

See! Two mighty rival races filling all the happy earth, Rivals still in glorious deeds but conscious of one common birth.

Gone the tread of armed feet, and gone the champing battle-steed, Breathes the gentle Ocean-stream from all his hostile navies freed,

Sunk in quiet beds of ooze and lost a hundred fathoms deep Lies the last death-belching monster muzzled in Lethan sleep;

Glides the plowshare through the ruins of the forts of old renown, Harvests wave with golden hope where stood the ancient walled town;

Marshes drained, saharas watered, harnessed winds and cataracts, Tropic belts of tangled Eden wrought to habitable tracts;

Gone the city's crowded space that bred a vermin race of men, Gone the pest-infected airs exhaled from Vice's reeking den;

Happy millions dwell in peace dispersed on fertile vale and down, Here an orchard-scented hamlet, there a park-embosomed town;

Rich and poor forgotten evils, crime and sickness slunk away Shamed and conquered by the beauty of the soul's untrammelled sway;

Flesh made pure and sweet within, the temple of a chastened life, Dead the feud of body and soul and closed the passions' blinding strife;

Birth the sacrament of hope, and death the old man's crowning grace,— Hallowed sunset after sunrise,—keeping still an equal pace

That no earth-born soul by climbing cause another soul to fall, But our Mother's ample bosom be the nourisher of all;

Less and less the Code's compulsion, more and more the inward Law, More and more disintegration of the power that holds in awe,

More and more new integration by the bonds of free consent To the Inward growing Outward—social life's embodiment;

Gone the hope of selfish heavens, come the faith in deathless deeds, Sunk the individual wish in serving universal needs,

Will and Fate at length consenting, Life far-seeing and sublime, Reaping now in wise content the harvests of the Coming Time.

"Prophet!" cries the voice of thunder; "leap a hundred ages back!
Lo, the nations, how they struggle in the old war-beaten track!

Speaking courteous words of peace but cramming brutish arsenals, Turning wholesome bread and wine to monster navy-sinking shells!

These must perish from the earth and lose their curst inheritance; Dying now the Latin nations, dying even glorious France—”

But a wreath of smoke low trailing hides the vision from my sight, And the deafening wheels of commerce drown the voice that bade me write.

O ye clamorous sons of Trade! Alack, the perilous thirst for gold!
Worship still the least erected of the fallen gods of old?

From the valley of the shadow of that gilded thing, Success, Lift your eyes, O burdened nations, to the hills of Helpfulness!

Hear the call of the Ideal like a trumpet from the van.
Gird your loins and quit the valley for the dawnlit heights of man.

Grandest Age of all the ages since the march of
mind began
From the dull unconscious atom to the crowning type of man,

Vale! Vale! Strokes of midnight! And a solemn passing hour!

Vale! Vale! Parting splendor, shall we mourn thy passing power?

Salve! Salve! Turn we forward from the sable funeral car!

Salve! Salve! Mightier Aeon, heralded by Love's own star!

Star of all the countless ages, Hesper of the ages gone,

Phosphor of the unborn æons, Hesper-Phos-phor, Night and Dawn!

How the heart leaps up to greet thee, Bringer of a mighty hope,

Light that lightens down the darkness where the infant nations grope!

Heir of all that mind has conquered, son of half a million years,

Sharer of all vital progress, seed of endless new careers,

Thirty circles of the months have fed my soul ambrosial food,

And I pour a full libation to the Roman god that stood

At the entrance of the years, and may he grant one prayer to me,

That my steps may pass the midmost milestone of the century,

That my eyes may see the fruitage of the seed this age has sown, That my hands may sow a harvest greater than the world has known.

(I, the type, not I, the ego, held aloof from intercourse, Egotist of egotists that hold myself the universe.)

Hail, O Brothers! Hail, O Helpers! By a cosmic law divine
All my work is wholly yours and all your work is wholly mine.

Through ye only have I strength to mould me to the cosmic plan, Million brained and million handed, millionfold a manly man !

Hail, Democracy, the star-eyed, climbing from the ancient mire, Trampling down their crowns and scepters who forbid thee mounting higher!

Spread thy palm above all nations, teach all peoples to be free, Banish war's red pestilence, and bring the golden age to be,

Tear the bandage from the eyes of partial Justice that her sword Smite the votarists of Pluto till their stolen gold's restored,

That her scale-beam tip as lightly for the weak as for the strong,
And her judgments ring out clearly through the clamorous cries of wrong.

Lift the torch of Reason higher, set it by the lamp of Faith, Till their light forever banish Superstition's sheeted wraith.

Warm the heart, expand the brain, and make the spirit large and free, Till we reach the godlike selfhood and devote our strength to thee.

And beyond our power of asking lead us upward into light, Overrule us when we stray and strengthen only in the right!

Hail, Democracy, the star-eyed, mounting ever to the stars!
Hail to thee whose day is brightening with the century's morning bars!

Slowly moves the hand of Progress o'er the dial-plate of Time, Till we half despair to see it move beyond the hour of prime.

But if life appear to linger, nations halt or backward creep,
'Tis the stalwart athlete, Nature, backing for a mightier leap.

Shall we curse the age as senile just because our hair is gray, Count that light and hope are dead since evening glooms about our day?

Life is young, Time's latest born, his arch of promise lingers yet Resting on its charmed gold, Youth's goal forever onward set.

Aye the young man's dreams are truest, and the burnt-out fires of age But the dead and dying camp-fires of each last preceding stage.

O despair not, men and brothers, deeming human nature weak!
Toothless age must ever mumble through his snow-heaped hollow cheek,

That the year is growing cold and the harvest-fields lie dead,— Stubble where he hoped for blade, and sunlight changed for skies of lead.

When ten thousand ages toiling fashioned man their crowning work, Shall we find that potent seeds within his inmost being lurk,

Waiting only fair occasion to expand to hideous life And destroy the rarest fruitage of developmental strife?

What a million years have made no less than million years can mar.

Then despair not, men and brothers, though perfection lingers far,

For we judge as simple children when we make our little day

God's criterion of progress and the measure of his way.

Forward! then the century's birth-cry! Forward! still the cry of Youth!

Forward! yet the hope of manhood! Onward to the goal of Truth!

Forward! though the days be gray that follow morning's purple bars!

Forward! for the darkest night is ever thickest sown with stars!

Come, thou hoped-for happier Aeon, sung by bards, by seers foretold,

When the earth shall bask in sunlight of her lordlier Age of Gold!

Or, if floating in the distance far beyond our power to seize,

Drop the mirage of its splendor just beyond our certainties,

That the glamour of Time's promise, hovering o'er the horizon line,

May compel its own fulfilment in the evolving Life divine!

Dec. 26, 1900.

A GRAY DAY.

I

A gray day
For a May day
And a gloom in the heart for me!
O the puppet play!
And they dance as gay
As the crickets leap
In a scented heap
Of new-mown hay!
And I, ah me,
The one in a million to see!

II

A ghost hand
From the coast-land Whither all things hurry and flee!
O the unseen hand!
How its fingers expand
And clutch at the wires!
And the play retires
To the shadowy strand.
And I, ah me,
The one in the million to see!

III

A chess game, (A mere dress game,) With helpless pieces aboard!
O the bootless game!
Knights fall for fame
As the pawns for food Or the Ermine's good, Kings checked the same!
And I, ah me,
One conscious pawn in the horde!

IV

A ghost hand
From the lost land Whither all things stagger and reel!
O the cold mist hand!
Its fingers are spanned,
And knight and pawn
And bishop are gone
And the game is banned!
And I, ah me,
The one in the million to feel!

V

A blind law, (Were't a kind law?
Which the uttermost stars obey!
O the pitiless law!
An insatiable maw Engulfs all lives,
And what survives
Has tooth and claw.
And I, ah me,
Must prey, or become a prey!

VI

I could dream, (O a good dream!)
That the fecund years might see The dusk grow to gleam,
    The ice burst to stream,
    The thistle make room For the rose to bloom, Use and beauty supreme!
    But this, ah me, Takes the millions of years to be!

VII

A clear voice,
    And a near voice,
Speaks out of my soul to me.
    O the sweet clear voice!
    O freedom of choice
    That the clear voice speaks!
    O the light on the peaks
    Where the dawns rejoice!
    But I, ah me,
The message is false, I can see!

VIII

It grows old,
    Ay, it grows cold,
For suns and systems will die!
    O the spaces untold!
    Worlds of worlds manifold All coming to naught!
    O why were they wrought
    To perish in cold?
    And I, ah me,
To breathe but one instant and die!

IX

What discord
With this chord Struck sharp from the lyre of my soul!
O the trembling chord!
Like the thrust of a sword
In a valiant heart Is the poignant smart
Of Fate's stern word.
For I, ah me,
Am a part to be ruled by the whole!

X

O the gray day,
The lost May day,
And the gloom in the heart for me!
O the puppet play!
Let it dance away
As the crickets leap!
Let them blindly keep Life's holiday,
Though I, ah me,
Am fated to feel and to see!
April 24, 1900.

BEN HADAD.

Ben Hadad toiled along an endless road,
A massy wall of stone on either hand,— Mecca his goal—and ever as he strode His sandals crushed into the yielding sand.
Bowed down beneath a shapeless heavy load With anxious eye the narrow way he scanned.

One day—no whit less weary than the rest—Ben Hadad heard swift footsteps from behind, Yet turned not to behold the pilgrim guest—Whose haste betrayed him godlessly inclined—But labored undistraught like one possessed Of some diviner passion than his kind.

“Allah be praised, who made this glorious day, Good friend, and dropped it fresh from Paradise To lighten pilgrim feet upon their way!
The heart leaps up to see such sapphire skies Arch spotless o’er earth’s festal cup of clay Where Allah mingles priceless wines and spice!”

“A drunken word, and blasphemous as well!”
Ben Hadad answered, plodding on apace.
He saw not how unwonted shadows fell, Cast by the radiance of his fellow’s face, Nor marked the queer round shoulders—like the swell Of sleeping wings—that marred his tunic’s grace.

"A spotless sky? What madness this, I pray?
Spiced wine! 'Tis by our holy word forbidden!
Our prophet spoke naught of 'a glorious day.'
What he revealed not is most wisely hidden.
Look to your feet, and keep the narrow way,
A blameless walk, a spotless soul unhidden."

"Look up, Ben Hadad! Trust the living eye!"
The shining guest replied, and smiled benignly:
"Old laws decay and with their givers die, But Allah still renews himself divinely To heart and soul that ever open lie To Truth and Beauty. Take not thus supinely

Life's arduous gifts. These walls on either hand Though scarce breast high, shut out the world from you.
Behold the olive groves that dot the land,
The gardens and the liliated fields in view,
The palm's tall hostelry by zephyrs fanned That waves mute welcome to the pilgrim crew."

"Allah forbid!" Ben Hadad straight replied:
"Though I had faith beyond the prophet's measure,
I would not rise. To prove a madman lied, What saint would jeopardize his earthly treasure?
This sacred pack upon my shoulders tied I'll scarce discard to do a stranger's pleasure."

"Pray, what unshapely thing is this?" he cried, And smote the burden with his knotty staff.
Great clouds of dust burst forth on every side.

The shining guest pealed forth a hearty laugh:
"An ancient bed, I'll warrant, true and tried, By daily use worn down to musty chaff."

"Have you no rootage in the sacred past?
No treasures rescued from the pirate years?
No priceless old memorials that last From age to age? Pour forth your vollied sneers,
Rash infidel, I care not for the blast.
The ear alone such idle mocking hears."

"An inventory!" And again that laugh.
Ben Hadad answered with indignant grace:
"A bronzen tablet with an epitaph Snatched from the tomb of him who sired our race;
A foot-worn doorsill, broken quite in half,
The threshold of our first abiding-place;

"A tent-cloth stained by sun and morning dew, My grandsire's shelter when he fled from home;
A sword-hilt, set with gems, wherewith he slew
A templar-knight; a crescent from the dome
The sheik, my father, built in Kambalu, Beside the infidel's huge hippodrome;

"My mother's loom; a lock of silver hair;
The prophet's holy word securely bound;
My swaddling clothes; an old illumined prayer;
The collar of my brother's faithful hound;
The crib that knew a nurse's watchful care When childhood's dreamless sleep enswathed us round.

"These have I kept, though grieved at heart to know

So much must perish of no meaner worth.
These will I keep, and when at last I go To Allah's bosom, and forsake the earth,
My son shall have the pack, and I bestow
My wayworn sandals to increase its girth.

"Allah is God. He shall not lose through me One tittle of his world's uphoarded gain!" Ben Hadad ceased. His fellow wept to see The tortured form, the martyrdom of pain, And sighed: "Allah is God! May he set free Ben Hadad's soul from all its labors vain!

"Lose all and gain all!" Here the angel guest Touched with his staff the vast unshapely pack.
Its cords in sunder broke at this behest.
The huge bulk rolled in dust from off his back.
Ben Hadad rose erect with startled breast And saw no more the narrow beaten track.

He saw the sapphire skies, the olive groves, Gardens and lilled fields on either hand, White cornfields waving, flights of turtle-doves,
And lofty palms by gentle breezes fanned, Sheep on a hundred hills, cattle in droves,
And happy towns that dot the pleasant land;

And o'er him, mounting in seraphic flight,
His guest. He smiled, and fell upon his face And died. For joy at that unwonted sight, Or from despair, none knew. But Allah's grace

Upon his corpse, in death's benignant light,
Of that first smile preserved the blessed trace.

THE BALLAD OF THE GOOD SHIP
"DAUNTLESS."

Three weeks with never a breath of wind Off Wynland's marches moored
The captain's good ship 'Dauntless' lay With all her crew on board.
Her flag hung dead at her tall masthead, No ripple round her poured.
The sea-birds circled overhead And screamed across the fjord.

The grizzled captain paced the deck,
He strode impatiently.
His eye now marked the frozen land, Now swept the western sea.
Upspake the mate in sore estate:
"O captain, sennights three We've waited the rising of the wind.
What may the matter be?"

The captain raised his sullen glance, He lifted his hand to the sky:
"Why serve we longer the great White Christ Who thrones with God on high,
When a Wynland hag with a tattered rag His rule can thus defy?
The hand that is far when help is cried For harm can not be nigh!"

Then spake the pilot, a man of blood,
And a mighty oath he swore:
"O captain, give me your goodly sword And of men a gallant score.
I'll scour the land on every hand,
I'll hunt through mountain and moor, Till I bring you this hag with her tattered rag, In chains from yon frozen shore."

"Go, take my sword and of men a score, And bring me the sisters weird!"
"O women weird, ye feel my power,
No longer are ye feared.
Now give me a breeze to skim the seas,
Or by Beelzebub's beard I'll perch your heads on the tall masthead!"
His words the pilot cheered.

"Ho, ho!" they cried, those sisters weird:
"Fair winds hath this tattered rag.
Three pounds tobacco, a pipe apiece,
Three guineas of gold in a bag,
And the captain's ship shall dance and skip And never a moment lag Till English wives and English babes Shall greet his homeward flag."

The captain took their hell-wrought clout, But a crafty man was he.
He smote the captives with his sword.
The crew cheered merrily.
That magic shred to the tall masthead
The captain nailed in glee.
Three knots in a string, and a tattered rag,— Three winds he held in fee.

He clove the first knot with his sword.
A wind rose steady and strong.
“Home, homeward bound!” the pilot sang,
The crew joined in the song.
Right merrily sped she straight ahead
All day and all night long.
The sea-birds scream across the main,
The sea-beasts round her throng.

His good sword clove the second knot,
The wind, it blew a gale.
It veered now east, it veered now west,
The mate grew ghastly pale.
The good ship lunged, she leaped and plunged,
And shuddered with straining sail,
But she held her way for a night and a day, Though waves dashed o’er her rail.

“Ho, ho! my good ship rides the storm,”
The burly captain cried: “The gale in the cordage whistles and howls, Such song is the seaman’s pride.
So gallantly borne, by the morrow morn,
At anchor we shall ride,
And English wives and English babes Shall gather at our side.”

His good blade leaped and clove once more.
The gale, it grew a blast.
The billows leaped, the good ship crashed,
The captain stood aghast.
For straight ahead from the ocean's bed A rock rose ribbed and vast.
The loosened demons shrieked and laughed
As on to her doom she passed.

The White Christ smiled on the waters wild,
They grew as smooth as glass.
Next morn on a wild and unknown coast
A wide-eyed fisherman's lass At play on the sand of the salt sea strand Saw floating corpses pass;
But never a priest in all the land For their wandering souls said mass.

MID CLOVER BLOOMS.

O to lie mid the tangled blooms,
A child of Earth and the blue June skies,
And list to the song of the bumblebees That tipsy with honey go tumbling over From head to head of the purple clover That swing in the clutch of their golden knees!
O to lie 'neath the blue June skies
In tune with the life of the scented glooms!

The cricket sings where the golden light Is quenched in the dusk of the standing grass, And the grasshopper climbs to the topmost leaf To bask in the sun of rare midsummer, A holiday guest and chance new-comer,
That drains life's cup though the feast be brief Nor grieves at last o'er the empty glass
As he drifts in dream to the voiceless night.

The katydid calls from her leafy bower,
And a boisterous sisterhood over the way Affirm and deny with impetuous zeal, A gossiping town without purpose or guerdon, Till the garrulous hedgerow grows a burden, While the shrill cicada with mail of steel,
From his tall acacia startles the day,
And stabs with his song the noontide hour.

O white cloud floating in liquid blue,
That driftest so lazily over my head!
A breath blew out of the west at morn,
And out of the void of the fleckless ether, Rejoicing to greet fresh fields beneath her,
A feathery form, sweet cloud, was born!
Shall her bright life for their thirst be shed?
Or melt in the blue sky whence she grew?

O to lie in the scented glooms,
A child of Earth and the blue June skies,
And list to the voices of summertide,
And feel the beat of life's mystic weaving,
With an open heart life's gifts receiving,
A pensioner willing on bounties wide!
O to lie 'neath the blue June skies,
At one with the purple clover blooms!
Nov. 23, 1901.

THE VANISHED WOODS.

How changed the scene from what I knew,
Sweet woods, when last we bade adieu!
The woodman's axe has loudly rung December's ice and snows among And chased each Dryas from her berth To feed some ravenous-throated hearth.

Perennial woods I deemed ye then, Centennial peace for unborn men,
A sacred gloom for revery,
The nurse of star-eyed poesy, Sequestered shrine and husht retreat, Unstained by greed's unhallowed feet,

And in your scented shades I nursed A life in richest dreams immersed, While numbers to the visions came,
Songs careless of or name or fame,
Where beauty seemed its own excuse
And song the soul's most perfect use.

Reclined full-length beside the stream That guiltless of day's garish beam Ran darkling down and gurgling broke O'er serpent roots of gnarled oak,
I gazed upon one rift of blue:
The softened radiance sifted through

And iris mingled with the green The drooping beechen boughs between, Until its far-off glory seemed The goal of all the poets dreamed.
So lost in revery I lay And dreamed the golden hours away!

O shameful idleness and sloth, Companion to the rust and moth!
O judge not so, poor dreamless friend;
The lily of the field may spend Her whole sweet life 'neath unsought skies, Her cup unseen by mortal eyes,

And yonder pink anemone That nods so lightly unto me Sits dreaming by the brooklet here In silence through the whole long year To bloom one week in modest wise For one chance pair of charmed eyes.

In sooth, good friend, it seems to me, A dreamer born, howe'er it be,
That idle dreams are food and drink,
That one hour by a river's brink, Lapped cool in dappled shade, is more Than all your wise men's thrifty lore.

O wasteful purblind prodigals Intent upon your barns and stalls, Heap high your stacks of yellow sheaves, Feed fat your herds of shining beeves,
And take no thought for aftertimes, For aftertimes nor poets' rhymes.

Heap on the wood and toast your shins
And snugly dream of bursting bins, Of widening fields of new-cleared land,
Of virgin soil on every hand,
Of log-heaps, smoking pioneers
That make a way for whitened ears.

O sordid Comfort, full-fed Ease, Green-shuttered there 'mid orchard trees,
For whom the rain of apple-blooms Is only sweeter than the glooms That linger round my beechen roots, By promise of autumnal fruits,

I thought that Greed had shunned this space To chaffer in the market-place, But lo, his hand is everywhere!
Alas for all the good and fair!
His hand has slain my favorite trees,
And all I loved are gone but these.

O wasteful purblind prodigals,
When the tornado madly falls, Unroofs your barns, and blinding rains Spoil half the season's garnered grains, When frost pulls up your clover-roots And blights in May your blooming fruits,

When whole young orchards winter-kill, Unsheltered from the storm-king's will,
When snowless wheatfields freeze and thaw,
When crows o'er sprouting cornfields caw,
When summer drought burns all things dry,
And lawns are parched, and meadows die,

Then reave you hair and beat your breast
And bring an offering of the best,
Make feast with open heart and free,
And plant each year some noble tree Those banished Dryads to placate And wrongs ancestral expiate!
June 2, 1900.

A SONG OF RENEWAL

Fling wide my garret window
Here in my house on the hill, Far out in the edge of the city Where sounds of traffic grow still!
I will lounge in the open casement,
I will perch on the window-sill,
To breathe for one moment, a freeman,
And cast off my gyves with a will.

Out yonder the fields are basking In July's golden glare, Ripening harvests of beauty
In the languorous murky air, While here I perish of mildew,
And rot with profitless care.
Old books, adieu! And my papers, Farewell! Long truce to despair!

I will fly this parchment kingdom,
This mine of the Arimasps, This universe of vellum,
Of leather and brazen hasps,
Where the soul is pent and straitened In boards with double clasps,
And the mind like a pinioned demon For freedom struggles and gasps;

Where I feel like a marginal figure In purple and green and gold, Done with an infinite patience
By a dull old monk of old,
As conventional, dead, and unmeaning,
As the empty tale retold
It illumined in gaudy splendor,— To crumble at last into mould;

For here the soul is a quarto,
Or at best but a folio,
And I long for the perfect unfolding That mortals seldom know, To lie spread out and unbroken In God's supernal glow, The Cloud-Compeller above me,
The old Earth-Mother below.

Out yonder the fragrant meadow Dotted with hay-cocks stands.
I can hear the workmen's laughter
As they ply their busy hands, Heaping the giant hay-bed
As it creaks through the bottom-lands, Drawn like a car triumphal At some high-throned queen's commands.

Who guides yon rural progress?—
No less than a queen, I vow!—
'Tis the farmer's buxom daughter, As lithe as a nymph, I trow;
A golden rock-rose in her hat-band,
Her nut-brown cheeks and brow Aglow with health and beauty That queens might envy her now.

And over beyond the rail-fence, Mantled with ivy and vines,
Where the purple ripe raspberry nestles
And the evening primrose shines,
The dead-ripe wheat is standing, Straw-broken, with pendant crines,
And unchidden by stewards of Ceres
The querulous sparrow dines.

And down in the lower bottoms, Along the dreaming brook That winds down its slumberous valley In many a sickle's crook, Where willow and sycamore, stooping, At their sun-flecked images look,
The cattle breast-deep are standing In many a shady nook.

And away and around in the blue haze,
To vision's uttermost bourn,
In billows of green that from evening Run to the shores of morn, Round meadow and pasture and wheat-field, Stretches the sea of the corn.
O why should the city's toiler Yon teeming paradise scorn?

For there is a tangled Eden, Where the trimmers' hands are too few To garner the gifts of Ceres While serving Pomona as true.
So wilding beauty runs riot,
And the weeds, a rollicking crew, Preempt every chink of the sunshine And stretch out their palms for the dew,—

But see! There's a pause in the haying!
The hay-bed, piled to the boom,
Is ready to choke with its fragrance
The barn's wide-throated room.
Now the jug with its beaded coolness, Filled from the well's deep gloom,
As dear as e'er flagon at banquet,
Is haled from its tangle of bloom

To gurgle around the circle From lip to laughing lip.
Now deftly the farmer's daughter From its cool rim takes a sip To bless the draught for the workmen As its waters bubble and drip.
Then here's to the Queen of the Harvest!
Long live toil's comradeship!

No longer my soul shall tarry Wing-clipt in this ancient mew.
I'll away to the fields and meadows Where living deeds are to do.
I'll out in the dews at sunrise, I'll toil the long day through,
And wear out this mildewed body
And win me a soul anew.

And when the long day closes,
And life has forgotten its husk,
By the side of the farmer's daughter In odors dearer than musk, To the homestead nested in pine-trees .
That bite the sky like a tusk,
To the goal of a rest supernal I'll walk through the cool sweet dusk.

IMPERFECTION

Never a summer breeze
From his far sea-cradle blows But lingers among the gardens To sigh for one dead rose.

SONNET

My letter was returned with seal unbroken.

“Deceased!” Some cold official hand had traced

The penciled euphemism in careless haste
To send across the world the joyless token,
That love’s last word was left for aye unspoken.

Dead? Is he dead with whom I daily chased The beauteous phantoms o’er great Homer’s waste

Wide ocean? Shipwrecked lies our vessel oaken?

O friends, why mock ourselves with gloomy fictions?

Broad seas and broader years have not the power

To rob true friendship of one precious hour.
We hold sweet converse still,—dare Fate’s restrictions,—

And face to face, whate’er cold reason saith, We’ll wander through the world untouched by death.

JUL 27 1910

One copy del. to Cat. Div.

JUL 27 1911

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 018 407 786 3